

LEAGUE TABLE

► Lupin is the sixth-largest pharma firm by revenue. However, in FY25, its revenue was less than half that of the leader Sun Pharma

Swaminathan says. “We are open to acquisitions in India and specialty buys in Europe and the US, but only if valuations are compelling.”

In India, the opportunity is broader than defending existing positions. The Indian business has been growing consistently faster than the overall market, with about two-thirds of revenue coming from chronic therapies. Lupin is now building positions in newer segments, oncology, women’s health and gastroenterology, as it looks to deepen its domestic footprint.

Whether Lupin can close the valuation gap with its larger peers will depend on the biosimilar and innovation pipeline delivering on schedule. Lupin’s targets are clear. Much will depend on execution.

TARGET PROGRESSION

Nilesh points to a progression of targets as a reference for the ambition ahead. He says, when Lupin was at ₹100 crore, the target was ₹1,000 crore. When it reached ₹1,000 crore, the target was $1 billion. When $1 billion was achieved, the vision extended to $3 billion.

“He always had a number in mind for where he wanted Lupin to go,” Nilesh says. “A pharmaceutical company is known for its brands. Therefore, that proprietary piece will be extremely important for us.”

Vinita frames the destination in terms of what the company will stand for. “Our aspiration is that innovation becomes a significant part of Lupin’s business. At the same time we remain committed to affordable medicines through generics.”

Whether Lupin can close the valuation gap with larger peers will depend on whether the biosimilar and innovation pipeline delivers on schedule. Both Nilesh and Vinita have laid out targets. Much will depend on execution. BT
