The other key players which led the deal are Kirti Ganorkar, Managing Director, and Jayashree Satagopan, Chief Financial Officer, Sun Pharma. Ganorkar, who was closely involved in the Ranbaxy integration and now leads this one, framed the Organon transaction as an expansion of Sun's innovative business.

The deal also resolves a long-standing limitation in Sun's specialty business. Ilumya, the company's flagship dermatology drug, has been launched in only 35 countries, partly because Sun had to depend on out-licensed commercial partners in markets where it lacked its own sales force.

"Organon is giving the company a platform to commercialise its own innovative products across multiple markets," Ganorkar tells BT.

The acquisition also adds a meaningful China presence. Organon generates over $800 million from China, roughly 13% of its business, primarily through established brands in cardiovascular, respiratory and fertility segments.

Organon's portfolio is heavily weighted towards mature established brands, many of which face slower growth and pricing pressure across markets. Sun's independent presence in China is negligible at present.

WHAT SUN IS BUYING

For Shanghvi, the attraction lies in how Organon's three businesses fit into Sun's long-term strategy. The first is innovative medicines, anchored by Organon's women's health portfolio, which contributed $1.75 billion to Organon's 2025 revenues. Its flagship product Nexplanon generated $921 million. Combined with Sun's existing innovative portfolio, the innovative segment grows from 20% to 27% of total combined revenues.

The second is the established brands portfolio, which accounted for over 51% of Organon's revenues, or $3.69 billion, in 2025. These brands have declined 2% annually since 2021. "This part of the business is not growing, but there is an opportunity for us to grow it," says Ganorkar.
