transform the company over the longer term," he said after the Organon deal. "In turbulent times, you have an opportunity to do things which generally would be difficult if times were normal," he said.

"Integration of two large businesses, Organon's slower-growing established brands portfolio, scaling the biosimilars business and servicing nearly $8.5 billion of debt would remain among the near-term challenges for the combined entity," say Sheth and Agnihotri.

What is different this time is the geography, scale and operating context.

THE NEXT GEN

That brings us to what Shanghvi has not said publicly but what the deal makes impossible to ignore: this is also a bet on what Sun Pharma becomes after him. Shanghvi's son Aalok, the COO, leads the emerging markets business, and has overseen the company's expansion across nearly 80 countries and led launches of specialty products across APAC and parts of Europe. His daughter Vidhi, Vice President and Head of Consumer Healthcare and Nutrition, has worked across marketing and distribution. Around them is a layer of professional management, including Ganorkar and Satagopan, that Shanghvi has carefully assembled. "Any decision that I take now, I keep my family involved as they will have to live with the implications of those decisions, because I may possibly not be there at some point," Shanghvi said.

"What I'm excited about is the opportunity to be able to also strengthen the existing management capability of Sun because we will have a large number of performing managers coming in from Organon," he added.

The Organon deal, seen through this lens, is not just about competing with Pfizer and AstraZeneca. It is about building a company large enough, global enough, and institutionally deep enough that it does not depend on any one person to run it, including the man who built it.

Writing the largest cheque of his life, Dilip Shanghvi is betting that Sun Pharma is the company to prove that. BT
