

"PLACE THE GOOD OF THE NATION BEFORE THE PARTY."

J.B. Kripalani

This was Kripalani's appeal to "Congressmen who were not afraid of the British bullets and bayonets". The Gandhian from Sitamarhi, who had quit the Congress to form the Kisan Majdoor Praja Party, in protest against P.D. Tandon's pro-Hindutva turn, took on Defence Minister V. Krishna Menon in perhaps the greatest speech ever made in Parliament. "We have lost 12,000 square miles of our territory without striking a blow," he said. Menon, he said, was wasting the "money of this poor". The speech was a warning sign that Nehru did not heed. But Menon had his revenge in 1962, defeating Kripalani by 1,00,000 votes in North Mumbai constituency.

Friendship First

John Kenneth Galbraith (centre), John F. Kennedy's ambassador, arrived in India and became a great friend of Nehru, always sceptical of Americans. His Ambassador's Journal was a delightful diary-like account of his stay in Delhi.

0.1

was the percentage of the Naga population in India numbered at 5 lakh, according to the 1961 Census. Today, there are 1.7 million Nagas, forming .001 per cent of the country's population, 90 per cent of whose means of livelihood is farming.

FOR SERIOUS AUDIENCES

Many do not consider this his greatest film (that honour belongs to Meghe Dhaka Tara) but Ritwik Ghatak's Komal Gandhar brilliantly plotted the rivalry of two theatre groups who come together to stage Kalidasa's classic, Shakuntalam. Ghatak's use of sound and camera created a powerful critique of a divided Bengal which made work difficult for the director. But its commercial failure prevented the talented filmmaker from making more films in the later 1960s.
