That's what Mohammad Ayub Khan (above left) said when he took over Pakistan, becoming the first Pakistan general to lead a coup in 1958. The commander-in-chief of the Pakistan Army since 1951, he was also the first to openly align with the US against the Soviet Union and establish close ties with China, in many ways setting the tone for subsequent governments. But the war against India in 1965 was the beginning of his end, with his foreign minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto resigning after he signed the Tashkent Declaration with Lal Bahadur Shastri (above right) and aligning against him. Under pressure from him and another opposition leader Maulana Bhasnani, he had to turn over the government to Commander-in-chief Yahya Khan.

Ronald Segal in a study, The Crisis of India

"What foreign observers are finding perturbing is that free expression of liberal views by Indians seems to be in danger."

CIRCULAR BEDS, FANCY CARS

Waqt, Yash Chopra's multi-starrer, was a tribute to the spirit of Punjabis, with its lusty colour and spirited youngsters. Its design ethos, suggesting a prosperity of no fixed address, was much copied. As movie scholar Ashish Rajyadaksha wrote: "It had a series of living rooms in pink and blue, with fountains and circular beds in bedrooms, motor boats and fancy cars in which the rich raced each other to get the girl in between attending huge parties". Ah, yes, there was also Sadhana's hair, Raj Kumar's sharp suits and Shashi Kapoor's smile.
