Career Wisdom

Some Tips for Career Changers

Monster often hears these recurring questions: "What do you do if you're sick of your work?" and "What if you want to try something different?"

"Some frustrated community members have pointed out that the bulk of career management advice focuses on doing better in your current field or organization rather than finding a new one altogether.

People are changing fields all the time, but the usual strategies might not apply.

Forget search firms.

Headhunters have no use for someone who has made his or her mark in another field -- unless the transfer of skills is incredibly seamless.

Most people responding to newspaper ads have experience in the field advertised. Holding your own in that field is difficult, unless you write a dynamite marketing letter showing how your skills fit exactly with the employer's needs.

These strategies are much more likely to get you happily transplanted in another field.

Don't expect Monster's job listings to do it all.

Again, specially customized resumes and marketing letters might get you some nibbles, but you'll be up against wicked competition with lots of field experience.

Networking

Networking is still the strategy most likely to get you where you want to go. Call your university, grad school, or training program for names of alums in your target field. Ask the alums -- along with friends, family members and colleagues linked with your prospective career -- about their career paths, making transitions into the field and ways to get started.
