Career Wisdom

The Negotiation Dance

One step forward; one step back; step together, and back again.

To perform the negotiation dance, you must have a good sense of balance. Knowing your value will help you feel more confident about staying in step during the negotiation process. The employer takes the lead and you follow, staying with the rhythm. You move together through the process, taking care not to step on each other. The dance is never confrontational or harsh, but smooth and in harmony.

First the Music Starts

Begin with the realization that this is your opportunity to maximise your compensation. Now is not the time to sell yourself short or leave items on the table. Instead, focus on what you feel you need and ought to have, and then negotiate for it. Many employers will provide their most valuable executives generous packages of stock options, profit-sharing bonuses, generous severance packages, along with non-financial compensation like paid sabbaticals.

Let the Dance Begin

You call the hiring manager and say how delighted you are to receive the offer, but you have some questions and concerns. Scripting your dialog ahead of time will give you confidence to be succinct regarding what you want.

The Final Steps

Whether you are negotiating for more money or some other perks, the rules remain the same. Let the employer lead, and maintain your own sense of balance. By preparing and researching ahead of time, you can feel more empowered in this process, as a partner in a dance, moving with the flow. The rhythm of the negotiation should be smooth, moving toward the final step: acceptance and agreement.
