Different stakeholders tend to give precedence to different factors. This year, the audiences, specially executives and heads of marketing, sales, and finance departments, have given priority to the teaching methodology, including the kind and level of innovation carried out by the faculty, rather than their qualification. The importance of these factors in determining brand equity has gone up from a mere 2 per cent to 15 per cent this year.

MBA aspirants, however, still attach a lot of importance to superficial factors like placements. Even though, their overall importance has declined from 13 per cent last year to 3 per cent this year, students continue to swear by them, a proof of which is their notching up an extra 24 per cent in the pie of determinants.

The stakeholders, however, lay emphasis on specialist programmes in marketing, finance and mass media.

In a world of perpetual shortage of human resources, 100 per cent placement is no big accomplishment. "All students get placed within one month, if not in a single day, of graduating from a business school," says Nunzio Quacquarelli of QS World MBA—an international company which provides a network for business education. It is actually the reputation and the goodwill a school enjoys that fuels the interest of a potential employer. While the quality of placements now occupies just 3 per cent—down from 13 per cent
