Global and Akshay Kumar's Bengal Warriorz, have converted large social media followings into stronger ticket and merchandise sales during home legs.

THE PLAYBOOK EVERY-ONE ELSE WANTS

Ten years on, PKL is the reference point for anyone trying to build India's next generation of sports leagues in wrestling, athletics, esports and beyond.

Capri Sports also owns a team in Ultimate Kho Kho, another raw, homegrown sport launched after PKL had proven the model.

Gupta, also CEO of Rajasthan Warriorz in Ultimate Kho Kho, says PKL's influence is part of a broader league-building playbook. "There are good examples of successful sports leagues and learnings on what has worked and what hasn't," he says.

Cricket's dominance in India was never in question. What PKL proved is that the space next to it is not fixed; it can be built by whoever moves first, fully commits and bets on something everyone else assumes is dead.

What PKL achieved, and several other sports leagues launched around the same period could not, was due to the federation willing to modernise, a broadcaster willing to take equity risk and franchise owners willing to back an unproven product.

WHAT COMES NEXT?

Gupta says PKL's next growth phase will be less about rule changes and more about depth: sharper player data, better training science and deeper digital fan engagement.

As per KPMG report, beyond mainstream sports, India has always had a strong tradition of indigenous games like kabaddi, kho-kho, and wrestling. Their transformation into professional leagues like the PKL gave these native sports new visibility. PKL has consistently crossed 200 million+ viewers, making it India's second-biggest sponsorship property after cricket, signalling that India's sporting story is no longer a single-sport saga. Such milestones suggest a sporting economy on the cusp of something larger. BT
