Career Wisdom

Resume Rx

1. Don't be vague, and be sure to customize your resume for each employer. The inability to do these on-line accounts for some of the low return rate on on-line applications. Anytime you try to do a "one size fits all" approach you lose the all-important opportunity to craft the resume to fit a particular position.

2. Don't be long-winded. Be pithy and keep it to one (preferably) or two pages unless you want a job in academia, research, or the arts.

3. Don't confuse a resume and curriculum vitae. The latter is for employers who will want to know all about what you've studied, taught, written, researched, and exhibited. Resume readers want a quick summary of what you've done with just enough detail to let them know the depth of your skills. The rest they'll find out in the interview. If you drown them in verbiage, you'll never get to the interview.

4. Students and recent grads: put your education up top and include relevant courses.

5. Find out which skills the employer is seeking and be sure to showcase them. If you're short on actual job experience, include a HIGHLIGHTS or SKILLS SUMMARY section to "editorialize" about yourself a little.

6. Use verb phrases -- "conceived campaign for student elections", "created online student newspaper", "initiated weekly meetings for minority students", "lead charity drive" -- not sentences; this is not an essay or an obituary you're writing.

7. Use dates to show when you did things, not just the vague "one year".

8. NEVER overlook spelling errors or typos. That's a one-way trip to the circular file. Check and recheck. Typos and spelling errors usually occur when you try to do something at the last minute. So leave enough time!
