Career Wisdom

Watch for the Red Flags

Whenever clients tell us their careers have been derailed, I begin by asking questions. If downsizing isn't a factor, derailment can usually be traced to their failure to notice one or more red flags in their initial job interviews.

Knowing this, we ask whether or not the following three topics were discussed in their interviews. Why? Because interviews aren't just about securing offers, they are opportunities to assess whether or not you're a match for particular jobs. Here are the five areas you should be sure to address in an interview:

Job Description

It is very important to ask for a written job description. The job description defines the parameters of the job. Without a written job description, there are no boundaries, and the job can be a set up for failure. If you want the job anyway, ask if writing the job description will be the first assignment or task of the job. If the answer is no, proceed with caution.

Education and Training

You want to ask about training. When does it start? Who provides it? Is it offered on the job or do you need to seek it after hours? If it will be after hours, who pays for it? Knowing what is expected in terms of learning and training will help you assess if this is a job you can do, will do and want to master in the time allowed or expected.

Evaluation

You need to know when you will be evaluated, by whom and on what criteria. Ask. Knowing clearly what criteria will be used to evaluate you will help you benchmark your progress and position yourself for positive evaluations.

Before taking or turning down the position, try negotiating for what you want. When the basics are there, you can be confident you'll have a fair shake to succeed.
