INDIA INC'S TRYST with employee welfare dates back to 1947 when J. R. D. Tata created India's first corporate personnel (HR) department at Tata Steel to prioritise worker welfare and safety. The steelmaking arm of India's biggest conglomerate has not looked back since. Tata Steel now has a chief wellness officer whose job is to ensure the company's wellness budget (₹168 crore in FY26) delivers maximum results.

For decades, employee wellness in corporate India followed a familiar template: annual health check-ups, medical insurance, and occupational health services that largely met regulatory requirements. That model is rapidly changing.

Employers are increasingly treating health and wellbeing as a strategic investment, linking wellness to productivity, lower absenteeism, retention, engagement, and operational performance.

Tata Steel began rethinking its wellness strategy in 2023. "We deliberately shifted to an outcome-based wellness model," says Mukesh
