

One distinctive feature is the company's joint consultative system, where union representatives and management jointly decide wellness action plans. Tata Steel has 32 unions, including the Tata Workers' Union—its largest.

Every department has a manager-led wellness committee, says Agarwal. "In each department, we have wellness committees led and driven by a manager, and they are also evaluated in our annual reward and recognition function," he explains.

At Hyundai Motor India Ltd., the country's second-largest passenger vehicle producer by volume, wellness extends well beyond factory gates.

"Wellness is not limited to employees. It extends to their families," says Natwar Kadel, AVP & Vertical Head, People Strategy, Hyundai Motor India Ltd. (HMIL). According to him, lack of wellness has a direct or indirect impact on the way a person works. Mental wellness impacts physical wellness and an employee's productivity.

For factory workers at its manufacturing facility in Chennai, Hyundai has engaged employee welfare counsellors. Where required, counsellors visit employees' homes to understand family situations and provide support.

"About 32 employee welfare counsellors are available at our Chennai plant. The need for such counsellors is very high in plant locations. There is a taboo around speaking to a counsellor when one is dealing with marital or financial issues, and it impacts productivity on the shop floor. Employee welfare counsellors visit homes and try to help. These visits are completely anonymous," says Kadel.

Tata Steel, too, has deployed on-site counsellors at mining locations to provide one-on-one support to employees and their families. "These initiatives increased counselling utilisation while also helping reduce the stigma around mental health as senior leaders openly discussed seeking therapy," says Agarwal.

For white-collar employees, Tata Steel has added wellness retreats and Vipassana programmes at Atmantan and Fazlani Resorts in Maharashtra.

At Hyundai, an internal review found that only around 1% of employees were using Leave Travel Allowance.

"We looked at how many people were availing leave and found LTA usage was just 1%. We felt it was important that employees rejuvenate once every year, so we mandated five days of leave," says Kadel. "If they don't take it, their leaves
