80 | INDIA HAS MADE significant progress in expanding access to healthcare over the past decade. Yet for millions of families, the experience of seeking care remains fragmented, expensive and uncertain. Bridging this gap between coverage and care is the next frontier of health reform. As we work towards the goal of Viksit Bharat by 2047, building a healthier population will be as important as building a stronger economy.

Universal health coverage (UHC) is central to that vision, not only because it improves health outcomes but because it underpins productivity, resilience and inclusive development. India has taken important steps towards this goal. The launch of Ayushman Bharat–Pradhan Mantri Jan Arogya Yojana (PM-JAY) has expanded financial protection for hospital care, health and wellness centres have broadened access to comprehensive primary healthcare (PHC), and digital health initiatives are beginning to improve continuity of care. While these are important achievements, the chal-
