

and commercialisation of spiritual experiences are further contributing to sustained demand across demographic segments.

Deloitte India's Consumer Signals Report 2026 finds that even amid cautious discretionary spending, affluent Indians continue to prioritise high-value experiences, including travel and wellness, over material consumption.

The numbers help explain why hotel companies are investing not merely in larger spas but in entire ecosystems built around spirituality, preventive wellness and cultural immersion. Hospitality executives increasingly see sacred geography as a durable competitive advantage that cannot be replicated by beach destinations or urban luxury hotels.

The same evolution is visible at Siddha Wellness Village, tucked away amid the countryside in Faridabad, Haryana. Unlike destination spas built around indulgence, Siddha positions itself as a retreat grounded in ancient healing philosophies.

"The human body possesses an innate ability to heal when supported by the right environment, nutrition and lifestyle. Instead of prescribing quick fixes, we combine yoga, meditation, personalised therapies, wholesome cuisine, and nature immersion to encourage guests to adopt sustainable wellness practices," says founder Minu Singh.

The retreat's location is integral to the experience. Surrounded by gardens, organic farms and open landscapes, guests are encouraged to disconnect from digital overload and rediscover slower rhythms of living.

Wellness here extends beyond massages to include mindful movement, therapeutic consultations, relaxation techniques and customised lifestyle coaching designed to endure long after checkout.

Veena Sabharwal, 53, a corporate lawyer who stayed at Siddha last year, says the experience was "lifechanging."

"Previously, whenever I took such breaks, I felt rejuvenated for a while but fatigue set in again after a week or two. But here, I was advised sustainable lifestyle modifications which helped me stick to a new wellness regimen without any lapses. This has brought about lasting changes in my physical and mental health."

A NEW FORM OF LUXURY WELLNESS

That emphasis on lasting behavioural change is increasingly defining luxury wellness. Hotels are no longer selling temporary escape; they are promising "transformation". Perhaps no property captures this philosophy more effectively than VILEEN Rishikesh, perched above the Ganges in the lower Himalayas.

Conceived as an "Invitation to Pause", the retreat combines spectacular natural surroundings with immersive wellness experiences rooted in Himalayan traditions. Guests can alternate between yoga, meditation and sound healing sessions, therapeutic massages, mindfulness hikes, birdwatching and Ganga aartis, while dosha (energy forces)-specific menus reinforce the holistic approach.

"The vision behind VILEEN has always been to redefine what wellness means for today's traveller,"
