WOOLING BACK LOYAL CUSTOMERS

The carmaker is widening its SUV portfolio with plans to launch seven new nameplates over the next five years, aiming to woo back earlier customers who may have switched to other brands.

“Maybe, five years back, our line-up was not good enough to attract those customers to buy a second or third Maruti Suzuki,” Takeuchi says, adding that the carmaker is developing more products with new designs. “We will try to attract those customers who left Maruti Suzuki. The next important thing is trying to get their repeat orders. Our customers can always come back and buy bigger vehicles. Now the situation is different, and we can attract those customers with a wide variety of products,” he adds.

But the focus on SUVs doesn’t mean India’s biggest carmaker is ignoring first-time car buyers. “We have to be mindful that India is a country that is still developing quite rapidly. So, more and more first-time buyers will arrive. It is important to capture those first-time buyers,” he says, citing low car penetration in India.

Though Maruti Suzuki has launched a slew of SUVs in recent years, it is still absent from some SUV segments, most notably the subcompact segment, which gets several first-time car buyers.

“We would like to add products to the segments where we don’t have a product right now. We would like to do it as quickly as possible,” says Takeuchi, adding that a subcompact SUV is certainly in the pipeline. “We are preparing for that. If we don’t have any product in the segment, we are missing a whole bunch of opportunities over there,” says Takeuchi.

“In order to achieve a higher market share, we have to improve our market share of every segment,” he says. “In some segments, we have a market share of as high as 70%. On the other hand, in SUVs, we are only enjoying a little more than 20%, which is much lower than our national average market share (40%). In those areas, we want to make our presence stronger, and we hope that we improve our total market share,” says Takeuchi.

On competition from newer entrants in the Indian car market, Takeuchi points out that the company has more than 6,000 service outlets across the country. “This is substantially much more than the competi-
