

Recognized for integrating principles of self-mastery with organizational and societal models, Nandhiji's work focuses on cultivating clarity, sustainable decision-making, and long-term value creation.

His approach emphasizes the practical application of awareness, behavioural insights, and accountability within leadership, enterprise, and governance systems.

The Declaration of Consciousness Movement (DOCM) is a global movement

A Deloitte study points that organizations with conscious leaders have 50 per cent higher employee engagement levels.

When leaders prioritize the well-being and development of their employees, they create a positive work culture that results in higher levels of commitment.

To give wings to this thought, he launched Declaration of Consciousness Movement, a global non-profit initiative in 2012. It treats consciousness as an inherent human right, working to embed quality standards and ethics into modern belief systems and leadership. It advocates for the recognition of consciousness as a universal right, expanding upon the 1948 Declaration of Human Rights.

The movement is guided by a nine-part framework. It promotes principles supporting humanitarian cooperation, peace-oriented dialogue, climate responsibility, women's empowerment, youth development, innovation, and cultural harmony.

DOCM serves as a platform for encouraging leaders, institutions, and communities to explore decision-making approaches that balance progress with conscious consideration and collective well-being.

CNESS evolved from the Declaration of Consciousness Movement to a framework creating a new kind of technology company.
