

Weaving a Global Legacy, One Home at a Time

Sanjana and Sarah Arora turning D'Decor's scale and expertise into Sansaar's global sustainability vision.

For Sanjana and Sarah Arora, launching Sansaar in 2024 was not a break from their family legacy, but a natural evolution of it. The family name was already synonymous with the world's largest soft furnishing fabric manufacturer, backed by decades of manufacturing expertise, craftsmanship and scale. Their ambition with Sansaar was to challenge a common assumption: that products made with genuine environmental responsibility must come at a premium. Instead, the sisters built Sansaar around a simple proposition: to remain competitively priced while standing apart through conscious design, responsible choices and a stronger sense of purpose.

Momentum has followed with striking swiftness. Sansaar has already crossed 450 stores in over 100 Indian cities and built a catalogue of more than 3,600 SKUs across curtains, upholstery fabrics and, since July 2026, an entirely new bedding line fronted by brand ambassador Ranveer Singh. What makes the growth notable is where it has travelled. A B2B partnership with Bru Textiles secured Sansaar's entry into the Gulf's design trade, South Africa now carries the brand across nine regions, and a Malaysian distributor has opened Singapore, Vietnam, Indonesia and Sri Lanka. Few Indian home textile brands have moved from launch to a five-country footprint in under two years.

Sanjana and Sarah operate Sansaar in near seamless alignment rather than as two separate charges, and the figures affirm that discipline: revenue grew 56 percent year on year this past fiscal, a pace few legacy manufacturers match even in their most aggressive expansion years. Sanjana articulates the brand's philosophy with precision: "Sansaar stands out by blending elegant design with a deep commitment to sustainability." Sarah's framing points outward. "We are bringing the best of Indian design to a global audience," she says, describing the international push not as expansion for its own sake but as a correction, placing Indian craft where it has long been underrepresented.

The sustainability claims are underwritten by engineering rather than messaging. The Aroras operate a 1.2 million square foot facility running European finishing lines and robotic warehousing, cut emissions by half in Sansaar's first year, and now recycle 95 percent of water used in production. Certifications from OEKO-TEX, the Global Recycled Standard and three ISO frameworks give the brand the credentials Western buyers increasingly demand before they will place an order. On the current trajectory, Sansaar is on track to cross Rs 500 crore in revenue within the next two years.

The road ahead is one Sansaar is walking with clear intent. Conscious design has already won devoted audiences at flagship stores in Mumbai and Dubai, and that same confidence is now carrying the brand into tier two and tier three India, and onward toward the United States and Europe. For Sanjana and Sarah, scale and conscience have always moved as one, two halves of a single ambition propelling Sansaar toward its next chapter as a truly global Indian house.
