

Nandhiji said that conscious leadership can also foster a 'Viksit Bharat' (developed nation) and help India become a growth engine for the global economy.

Asked if it was possible to be self-aware and be profit-oriented at the same time, Nandhiji said all businesses have a pain point and if you can solve them, then one will be able to create a brand like Tata.

He said expanded thinking can lead to innovations and solve pain points in business environment. It also helps build quality, dependability and reliability in business enterprises.

Stating that ancient Hindu scriptures have traditionally promoted the higher purpose, Nandhiji said that those tenets could guide the hands of the CEO during period of turmoil.

Asked if one can be atheist and still be a conscious leader, Nandhiji said he would recommend everyone to start being an atheist.

"The power of freedom of thought is amazing because this aligns with science. It aligns with progress and wisdom. It aligns with the greater wisdom that is within each one of us. And the moment we tap into that now, we step into the first result of consciousness which is joy," he said. Asked where the business executive must seek emotional sustenance during work pressure, Nandhiji said consciousness is the end goal and we must trust our instincts as it sparks our genius.

Nandhiji said money must be seen as energy. "If I have money, I'm able to do my dharma in terms of where it's needed as that energy," he said.