GM: You're talking about 'Make in India, Make With Russia'. How do you think US President Donald Trump is going to react to all of this?

You know, neither me nor Prime Minister Narendra Modi, despite certain external pressure we face, have ever—and I want to emphasise this—approached our collaboration to work against someone. President Trump has his own agenda, his own goals, whereas we focus on ours—not against anyone, but rather aimed at safeguarding India's and Russia's interests. In our dealings, we cause no harm to others, and I believe that leaders from other countries should appreciate this.

AOK: President Trump recently said about India, if you are buying oil from Russia, you are funding the Russia-Ukraine war. How would you characterise that?

I never give character assessments about my colleagues—neither those I've worked with in the past nor current leaders of individual states. These assessments should be made by citizens who vote for their leader during elections. As for India's purchases from Russia... I would like to note and have already mentioned this publicly once—the US itself still buys nuclear fuel from us. That is also fuel—uranium for the reactors operating in the US. If the US has the right to buy our fuel, why shouldn't India have the same privilege? This question deserves thorough examination, and we stand ready to discuss it, including with President Trump.

GM: Trump has weaponised tariffs. How do you think India and Russia should handle the US administration?

He pursues his own policy, and he has advisors; his decisions aren't made out of thin air. He has advisors who believe that implementing such policies, involving the imposition of additional duties on trade partners, ultimately benefits the US economy. He is acting in good faith, I presume. Our experts believe there are risks involved, but it is the choice of each country and its leadership to decide which economic policy to adopt. We have never engaged in such practices, do not do so now, and have no
