

Knowledge gives women awareness, but action gives them power. “The real transformation happens when women start taking action—even with small amounts and build confidence through experience,” says Menezes.

DISCIPLINED BY DESIGN

Interestingly, women are more disciplined investors. Traditionally, women are inclined more towards saving money, often in the form of gold or bank deposits. When it comes to investments, women are more likely to be in for the long haul.

According to a study by FinEdge, an investment management company, 71% of women investors stay invested for over five years.

“Women’s patience in long-term investing and wealth creation is higher than men’s. Women understand long-term investing and hold investments for more than one year while men are seeking short-term, high-return strategies,” says Dilshad Billimoria, founder of wealth manager Dilzer Consultants.

Anecdotal evidence shows that women use investments as a means to increase their savings rather than to get rich quick. “This makes them more stable and long-term investors,” says Maheswari.

Women tend to approach financial planning with consistency and discipline. They are less influenced by short-term market volatility and more committed to long-term financial plans.

“Women investors value stability and sustained growth over speculation, making them naturally better at adhering to structured financial strategies that yield strong results over time,” says Bathwal.

Women have always been natural savers. “But we are seeing and helping transition the change towards investing. They are shifting from just keeping money aside to channelling it purposefully into investments. Budgeting, cash flow management, and goal-based planning are becoming a second nature to them,” says Menezes.

KEEPING IT SIMPLE

Investment is no rocket science. “Invest based on financial goals, choose investments based on risk and investment horizon, step up investments annually, and most importantly, remain invested. Don’t fall for trends—simple investments held for the long term will build wealth,” says Mrin Agarwal, Director of Finsafe India, a financial education firm.

Jain also stresses keeping things simple: “Dream bigger. Keep doing the boring stuff. Don’t look for excitement in investments. Don’t compete with anyone; be your own cheerleader. Starting early is more important than starting bigger,” she says.

Financial plan should mirror their ambitions—be it building a corpus for a car or a house or planning retirement. The principles of investing remain universal—goal clarity, risk management, and consistency. “Women should stay closely involved in reviewing their portfolios and working with advisors to ensure every investment aligns with their long-term objectives,” says Tuteja.

In the end, the real shift is simple: women aren’t just saving anymore—they’re strategising, investing, and steering their own wealth journeys. The moment she took charge, it became a movement, and it’s only now gaining momentum. BT
