

A piece of advice she wishes she'd been given when she was younger is that it's okay to try out a few things before deciding what you want to do.

"Find where your heart lies. Finding a job on Day Zero doesn't matter after a few years," she says. The second bit of advice for aspiring women leaders is the importance of finding the right kind of coaches and being open to change—something she has found extremely beneficial.

Arya rues the lack of role models for women, and while things are improving, feels that this shift has to be driven by both industry and the government. From questioning career development pipelines and succession plans to working with the government to make sure that existing pro-women policies are implemented, everyone has a role to play towards bringing about this change.

While societal change will be harder to come by, Arya remains focused on doing what she can within her own sphere of influence. BT
