How Isha Jajodia Is Building India's Answer to European Couture Houses Through Craft, Not Celebrity

by research how women dress, how luxury segments evolve, how global and Indian trends intersect. This allows us to design collections that are creatively distinctive yet commercially sound. My husband, Sandeep Jajodia strategic perspective strengthens the business dimension. Ultimately, my strength lies in knowing when to pivot, when to scale, and when to refine, while protecting the brand's creative integrity.

and placed in leadership roles, creating pathways for financial independence and creative agency. By nurturing both craft and confidence, we build a culture where women feel capable, valued, and seen. Empowerment isn't abstract; it's employment, skill development, and economic mobility.

From her New Delhi atelier, Jajodia is methodically constructing what she envisions as India's answer to European couture houses institutions defined not by celebrity endorsements or bridal market dominance, but by technical excellence and creative

You describe your leadership philosophy as "many in body, one in mind." How do you achieve that alignment in a creative environment?

Alignment requires investment. We conduct regular workshops, inspiration sessions, and skill-building programs to ensure the team remains creatively charged and technically sharp. But I also believe in discipline. Our work environment is both nurturing and performance-driven. Leadership means showing up with consistency, setting high benchmarks, and creating a culture where craftsmanship and collaboration reinforce each other. When everyone understands the standard we're building toward, creative expression and operational rigor become complementary, not contradictory.

What distinguishes your approach to building a luxury business in India's crowded couture market?

I balance creativity with measurable outcomes. My NIFT education and years of hands-on work taught me to translate design into viable business. Every decision at Roseroom is informed Roseroom explicitly positions itself around "empowered femininity." What does that mean operationally, beyond marketing language?

It's an ecosystem connecting three groups of women: those who lead the brand, those who create the garments, and those who wear them. We encourage clients to choose clothing that aligns with who they are, not societal expectations. Within the atelier, women are trained, upskilled,

In an industry often criticized for prioritizing spectacle over substance, Isha Jajodia has built Roseroom on an unfashionable premise: that disciplined craftsmanship and strategic clarity create more enduring luxury than seasonal trends ever could.

How does Roseroom contribute to India's positioning in global luxury markets?

We strengthen India's position as a center for high craft. Our atelier employs and upskills artisans in lace work, hand embroidery, and precision construction, creating stable livelihoods while preserving specialized techniques. By presenting these crafts through modern design, we offer luxury that's homegrown yet globally relevant. Roseroom reflects the evolution of Indian couture from ceremonial wear to contemporary luxury, helping shape India's presence on international platforms and within the global fashion conversation.

What's your long-term vision for Roseroom?

I'm building a global craft house known for precision, consistency, and modern design rooted in India. We'll expand internationally through strategic retail partnerships, global fashion weeks, and curated showcases. The brand will continue investing in artisanal skill-building, construction innovation, and category diversification. My goal is creating a luxury brand representing integrity, longevity, and meaningful craftsmanship representing India with strength and sophistication on the world stage. Not through volume, but through excellence that compounds over decades.
