

SUSTAINABILITY IS A TEAM SPORT

Jim Andrew, Chief Sustainability Officer, PepsiCo, on regenerative agriculture, water security, and more

BY KARISHMA ASOODANI

AT A TIME, when climate volatility, water stress, and resource constraints are reshaping boardroom conversations, sustainability is no longer a peripheral commitment, it is a strategic imperative. For global food and beverage major PepsiCo, that shift has meant embedding sustainability into the heart of its business model.

In an exclusive conversation with Business Today, Jim Andrew, Chief Sustainability Officer, PepsiCo, speaks about the company's 'PepsiCo Positive' strategy, circular packaging, and why trust and not optics is central to the company's climate journey. Edited excerpts:

Has sustainability delivered measurable business value in emerging markets like India?

About five years ago, we made a conscious decision to put sustainability at the centre of our corporate strategy. We call it 'PepsiCo Positive'. It's not CSR. It's about using sustainability to drive growth and long-term value.

In markets like India, that means reducing our environmental footprint, strengthening supply chains, supporting communities and delivering business results simultaneously.