that go far beyond their original applications. That mindset continues to guide how he approaches both product development and long-term investments.

Choudhary often returns to the company's roots in carbon chemistry, a discipline where even small changes in processing can significantly influence the performance of the final product.

Over time, he has overseen the development of an integrated manufacturing model that converts coal tar and related feedstocks into a range of specialised materials used across industries.

Today, the company commands more than 65% market share in coal tar pitch and over 68% in naphthalene in India. It is also among the leading global manufacturers of specialty carbon black. Yet in Choudhary's telling, the company's defining feature lies less in scale and more in the way it approaches product development.

"What makes this possible is a unique business model where every major product is powered by in-house R&D and innovation," he says.

This allows multiple high-value outputs to emerge from the same raw material. Oils can be converted into specialty carbon blacks used in industrial applications.
