“LEADERS, MANAGERS MUST LEARN CONSTANTLY”

Q Will AI replace the core principles of good management?

I think it has huge potential to augment management to bolster productivity. It will make it much easier to solve complex problems, but we still need the human who identifies some parameters that an organisation is trying to achieve.

So, I really do think when it comes to management, AI is incredibly powerful. AI has an exciting set of tools; it's changing what we teach and it's also changing how we teach.

Q What is the future of an MBA in the age of AI?

I think the MBA remains incredibly important. It is the most global degree, the most recognised degree in many ways, the most prestigious degree.

It has remained that because it has constantly reinvented itself... We don't sit still. We innovate. We're close to practice.

We check in with business leaders, we update our curriculum.

MBA is very different now than it was 10 or 20 years ago. And I'm sure it's going to be different 10 years from now. But that's how we make sure that it remains relevant.

Q In the future, will a management classroom not have a teacher? Will learning be reduced to individual streams, where each student, at their own pace and level of understanding, interacts with those things. I think you still have teacher, but you're absolutely right. The way I'm picturing it is, you know, small tables, maybe in groups, an agent who's part of the group, you know, solving a problem together. Learning is a social activity. And I think doing it in groups continues to make sense. But absolutely, I think, you'll see agents become very potent extensions of faculty.

Q Your institution has trained hundreds and thousands of managers. What skills does a manager need to adapt, not just survive and build for the future?

I think the most important things that leaders and managers have to learn is how to get into the habit of constantly learning. If leaders aren't learners, if they aren't people who embrace continuously learning.

They're not going to be able to be successful. So that's the most important thing. Then of course we can talk about what are some of the things they need to learn right now.

But I think creating an environment where people understand leadership means you got to keep learning your life. BT
