

THE GROWTH TRAJECTORY

- ▶ ABD's profits have improved sharply over the last five years
- ▶ One big reason is an effective backward integration strategy through a different vertical within the company. Instead, it chose to make a focused subsidiary and build a portfolio of brands. “The move to have a superstar like Ranveer Singh is strategic and mutually beneficial.”

Historically, ABD's brands have played in the mass-premium to premium segments. According to Basu, there was never a separate team for modern on-trade, namely star hotels, upscale fine or casual dining, pubs, bars or social clubs, nor for modern retail formats. “In both these spaces, the landscape for consumer experience has changed very quickly. With ABD Maestro, we have been able to build this skill set and culture, given the premium focus of our portfolio,” he explains.

Today, ABD Maestro has a play across spirits—among them are Arthaus blended scotch, Yello designer whisky, Rangeela Indian vodka, Zoya gin, plus imported Russian Standard vodka.

Through the acquisition of Goa-based Fullarton Distilleries' brands (Woodburns Indian whisky, Pumor gin and Segredo Aldeia), the existing portfolio was widened. This February, ABD Maestro launched The Collective Limited Editions, a single malt priced at ₹11 lakh per bottle.

The numbers justify ABD's overall premiumisation push. In the mass and premium segments, whisky accounts for around 65% of the overall market. As one moves to a higher price point, that number for whisky increases to 90%, with the rest of the market—including white spirits—taking away the rest.

Understandably, margins will be higher at these
