

There is little doubt that investors are interested in technology-first new-age sectors, but the chorus for profitability has increased. It is no different for Swiggy.

In Swiggy's core business of food delivery, while revenue surged from ₹3,414 crore in FY22 to ₹5,192 crore in FY24, it was still in the red, though losses fell drastically from ₹1,378 crore in FY22 to just over ₹9 crore in FY24. Overall, revenue nearly doubled landscape is dynamic, and one's instinct is important. We like the idea of building on our strengths and passionately exploring ideas," says Majety.

Rahul Bothra, Swiggy's Chief Financial Officer, says consumers are at the heart of everything, "and it is a question of making choices from adjacencies." Unlike its peers, Swiggy has, to a large extent, preferred the organic route to grow.

ALL ABOUT THE BOTTOM LINE

- Food delivery remains the revenue driver for Swiggy, even as quick commerce has grown
- Though losses have dropped sharply in food delivery, other businesses are still deep in the red from ₹5,728 crore in FY22 to ₹11,279 crore in FY24. Meanwhile, losses decreased from ₹3,138 crore to ₹1,612 crore in FY24.

BUILDING OUT

All conversations with Swiggy's top brass revolve around India, its demographics, and how that can be utilised to build a compelling and profitable business. Consequently, each of its businesses—food delivery and quick commerce being the most prominent—look at the new India as the perfect landscape to build on.

Enter Swiggy's office in Bengaluru and you can see some of that vibrancy. It is a large building buzzing with young employees dressed casually in jeans, with a smattering of some retro scooters here and there. "The

Of course, there have been buyouts—six in all, with Dineout and Lynk Logistics being the relatively recent ones—and there is proof that "investors have got more bang for the buck inorganically," says Bothra. Describing the uniqueness of his business, Bothra says each segment has "large total addressable market opportunities" and a constant funnel of new customers.

Some marquee investors—like Prosus, Accel, Elevation Capital, Norwest Venture, Tencent, among others—have cut big cheques because of that line of thinking and the ability to execute.

Fabricio Bloisi, CEO of Prosus, the Dutch-listed arm of South African firm Naspers, thinks the company has always been an innovation engine in food delivery. Prosus holds a 25% stake in Swiggy.
