

ILLUSTRATION BY RAJ VERMA

ability a lived reality requires a multi-faceted approach. One of the key strategies for achieving this transformational shift is through education and awareness. Organisations should prioritise investing in employee training and education. Additionally, sustainability training plays a critical role in aligning with business goals and contributes to long-term growth. ReNew's Project Surya aims to reshape the lives of 1,000 low-income women by helping them leapfrog into the modern clean energy sector, providing them with better livelihoods. Additionally, ReNew is training the youth through a first-of-its-kind climate curriculum aligned with the core principles of the LiFE movement. As the climate crisis intensifies, the curriculum aims to prepare the next generation to join the movement and lead a more sustainable lifestyle.

Further, corporations and governments should look at humanising sustainability by giving it a face that the masses can relate to. Appointing ambassadors and recognising champions is an effective way to communicate with diverse communities.

The efforts do not stop here. Brands can play a critical role in popularising sustainability and influencing consumer behaviour. A 2017 study reveals that 87% of consumers have a positive image of a company that supports social and environmental issues, and 88% of consumers remain loyal to them.

The role of effective leadership cannot be overstated. Top executives must inspire and motivate employees at all levels by integrating sustainability into the core business strategy.

Lastly, humanising sustainability requires a fundamental shift, one that moves beyond traditional notions of success and embraces the well-being of humanity and the planet.

Human-centric sustainability requires us to acknowledge that growth should not come at the cost of people's rights, health, and quality of life. It is about having a more equitable society. At the core, it's about cultivating a more fulfilling and sustainable lifestyle, in favour of a simpler way of living.

As we navigate the complexities of the 21st century, leadership and collaboration will drive this transformation. Moving forward, we should consider humanising sustainability as a survival imperative, where leaders, corporations, and individuals converge to navigate a holistic future. BT

Views are personal