AFTER A PERIOD of subdued growth, FMCG major Dabur India saw its top line growing after the pandemic. But as global economic uncertainties loom large on the horizon and competition intensifies in the domestic market, Mohit Burman, Chairman of Dabur India, is gearing up for the fight. In an interaction with Business Today, Burman, 55, shares his plans on how Dabur will scale its business over the next five years riding on its power brands. Edited excerpts:

How do you steer Dabur India towards a sustained growth path?

We have put together a strategy to drive business growth across all our verticals. The first pillar will be to focus on our power brands. Today, we have eight power brands in India and one in the international market. Our intent is to develop these power brands to power platforms by introducing a range of products and formats under each of these brands, thereby extending the portfolio and the total addressable market. In addition, we will also expand our list of power brands by including brands that have the potential to grow and become ₹100-crore and ₹1,000-crore brands.

How does Dabur compete in India's ayurvedic/herbal-natural products market?

We are re-staging our core to reach out to young India. We are looking at [a few] key aspects. The first is to build stronger scientific claims for each of our products and back them up with scientific data and clinical trials. We will [also] increase the relevance of our time-tested and efficacious products by introducing new-age formats. To give you an example, rolling [out] Chyawanprash in a powder format or as tablets and capsules. And, we have started rolling out aspirational packaging for our products to make them more attractive on the product shelves.

Moreover, we are driving up the pace of innovation. New product development has increased to become 4 per cent of our portfolio as against 1.4 per cent in 2018-19. Digital will be the other key driver of growth. We have also soft-launched our own D2C channel.

A new go-to-market strategy has also been put in place, which focusses on expanding our rural footprint and driving relevance across channels and platforms. We remain committed to our strategy of superior go-to-market execution by enhancing our distribution footprint while focussing on driving growth for our power brands and building an agile organisation culture in our pursuit of sustainable, balanced growth and value creation.
