rience. “It enables brands to create engaging and impactful campaigns that transform consumer interactions.”

A specific instance of how advertising worked on the Snapchat platform comes from Dushyanth Jayanty, Flipkart’s Vice President (Marketing). Its Flipgirl campaign (unfurled in mid-2022) with Hindi actor Alia Bhatt reached 24.5 million Snapchatters. “We harnessed the AR lens and redefined the shopping experience and turned it into an immersive and interactive journey,” he explains. According to him, what was achieved was Snapchat’s effectiveness in a more meaningful engagement with the younger GenZers in an innovative ad format.

According to Mohan, Snapchat’s performance marketing model—defined as a type of digital marketing where businesses only pay for results such as leads or sales, rather than for the placement for their ads—is taking off well in India. “We are already relevant to brands with our 13-34 audience. Equally, the transition to online means work done on product and engineering will help us in India too,” he says. There is an audience base that is yet to go online and he thinks there is a good chance they may first come to Snapchat. “Advertisers get the performance marketing model with a clear understanding of the value it brings. The agenda for the India team is to move from 200 million to 500 million as soon as possible.” From a strategy point of view, the focus has not been so much on revenue but rather on growth in terms of more users and more engagement. In terms of the advertising mix, it has consumer goods, entertainment, e-commerce, and financial services to name a few. “Parts of e-commerce with a focus on the
