around ₹56 lakh. He had left his corporate career in 2000 and had been consulting and teaching ever since. The doctorate from ISB added significant credibility to his profile. “I believe it has aided in opening several opportunities for me,” he says. “I chose to do my research in the very contemporary topic of GCCs. I have been working in this field for the past 25 years. The research has added to both my credibility as well as my ability to view the field with a ‘pracademic’ lens. I have used my research on several occasions in my consulting assignments as well as in the GCC leadership programme that I co-designed at IIM Bangalore,” says Seth.

RETHINKING LEADERSHIP

Amid the focus on challenges being faced by companies, business school leadership often forgets the need to rethink its role. While Peter Drucker conceptualised many foundational theories of management thinking, in recent years, his vision has largely been forgotten by companies with managements focusing on shareholder capitalism. But in the new geopolitical and geoeconomic environment, there have been some calls to bring businesses and business education back to Drucker’s vision that companies serve as a vital force towards global peace and prosperity.

CMI’s Lopamudra sums up. “Ethical leadership isn’t just about doing what’s right—it’s about doing what’s right when it’s hard. In today’s competitive world, leaders are often faced with decisions that test not only their business acumen but also their moral compass. Ethical leadership means making choices that prioritise integrity, fairness, and respect—even when no one is watching. Can organisations be both ethical and agile? Can we build cultures where doing the right thing isn’t just encouraged but its expected?”

If that is the goal of businesses and business leaders today, B-schools also need to rethink their goals. This is the moment to fix B-schools. BT
