

53

PHOTOS BY HARDIK CHHABRA

It is very important that we stay in tune with the times and the needs of society—delivering that is the key. McGill has done that very well. We have constantly evolved in tune with the needs, and our business school continues to do that.

How do you remain current, how do you address the most recent needs, and how do your models for teaching management change? Management has changed dramatically. Let's take the example of university management. When I went to a university here in India, the vice-chancellor was an all-powerful person, and what the VC said happened. It was a classic command-and-control model.

I don't know how it is here now, but I can tell you that at McGill, if I tried to issue a command, that would be the most certain way to ensure that what I ask for doesn't get done.

My role as a leader today is to build consensus, lead through intellectual and moral authority, and bring people along so they feel they want to be part of the project rather than be told to fall in line. And I don't think it's that different in the private sector.

There is a greater demand for servant leaders—people who lead to serve, rather than to command. People are asking for not just shareholder value but social value. I call it stakeholder value, and that value is to be provided in a different way than simply through