

FROM SUPPLY CHAIN disruptions in Asia to policy changes in the West to operational instability and burgeoning technology, no event is distant for business leaders. They, in turn, are fraught with an additional challenge—geopolitical fluency. A word in the boardroom, a decision on the factory floor, or a post on social media can send ripples. The question is no longer if leaders should respond to geopolitics, but how.

CHANGING CAPABILITIES

“There are numerous geopolitical challenges that are impacting the ways chief executives view the global economy,” says Yezdi Nagporewalla, CEO, KPMG in India.

He explains that organisations that adopt fresh approaches to supply chain management, technology integration, and workforce development can not only mitigate the negative effects of geopolitical shifts but also seize new competitive advantages. “By fostering a culture of agility and responsiveness, organisations can thrive amid uncertainty and navigate the complexities of geopolitics with confidence,” he adds.

The KPMG 2025 India CEO Outlook reinforces that CEOs, both

LEADERSHIP AS GEOPOLITICAL LITERACY

No Longer Optional

Geopolitical awareness is a core leadership skill that shapes every decision from supply chains to social impact

Think Beyond Headlines

Effective leaders read between the lines, grounding decisions in facts, foresight, and empathy rather than fear or reaction

Composure Under Pressure

In times of global uncertainty, calm and clarity build trust. Steady leadership inspires confidence amid chaos

Purpose Over Posturing

Silence and speech both carry weight. The strongest leaders respond thoughtfully with conviction, not emotion

Redefining the Boardroom

Geopolitical intelligence, adaptability, and moral clarity are now board-level priorities, the new markers of resilient leadership
