

“No one wants a ten-course meal anymore,” Kashyap says. “They want small plates, wine buckets, bar trolleys, and conversation.”

At his in-house production facility he works with eighteen different materials, from metal to marble, crafting everything from plates to serving tools. “There’s an entire theme around a table now,” he says. “It’s not about a plate—it’s about the experience.”

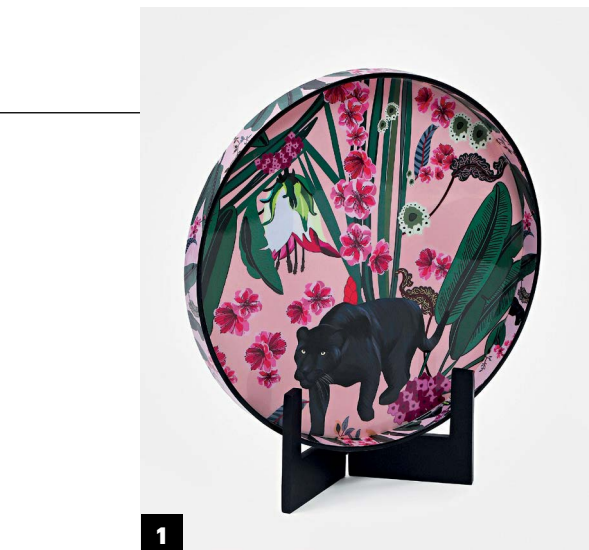

The Market for the Modern Table

India’s tableware market, valued at $5.29 billion in 2024, is projected to nearly double by 2032, according to a survey. The shift is part of a broader post-pandemic turn inward. During the pandemic, as hospitality shut down, consumers sought to recreate the “five-star” feeling at home, giving rise to the segment. And now even though hospitality is back, the charm of hosting at home is not lost.

Of course, for fashion brands, home décor is an extension of their brand, a relatively cheaper entry point into the brands universe. Globally, brands such as Gucci Décor, Fendi Casa, Dior Maison, and Armani/Casa have all extended their aesthetic to interiors.

It’s about living with the brand, not just wearing it. Homegrown labels have also taken a leaf out of their international counterparts. Satya Paul Home and Ritu Kumar Home, that launched in 2019 reinterpret Indian textiles and motifs in cushions, wallpapers, and tableware.

Designers Abraham & Thakore view tablescaping as “an art form that elevates everyday rituals.” Their Brushstroke Collection, inspired by Japanese calligraphy, pairs minimal plates with hand-drawn black, gold and red motifs. “The table has become a space for expression,” says Co-founder David Abraham. “An elegant table-cape isn’t just functional—it’s part of creating memories.”

Meanwhile, Shivan & Narresh, known for their bold resort-wear, recently opened their first standalone SHIVAN & NARRESH Homes Store at New Delhi’s luxury mall The Chanakya. “For us, tableware is a seamless extension of lifestyle,” says Naresh Kukreja, founder and creative director. “Our clients see tablescaping as self-expression. Just as they curate wardrobes, they curate dining experiences.”

Their tableware line mirrors the brand’s signature prints—vivid, sculptural, and unapologetically Indian. The segment, Kukreja says, is “doubling each year” and could become a core growth pillar in the next five years.

And then there’s Sabyasachi Mukherjee, whose Bengale Tigris collection for Nilaya by Asian Paints launched this year in Mumbai.

Hand-painted plates and gilded tigers bring his maximalist sensibility to the dining table.

The collection, which is available exclusively at Nilaya Anthology in Mumbai, is in collaboration with The Sabyasachi Art Foundation.

Other homegrown labels like Ellementry, Good Earth, and Nicobar are reviving artisanal traditions—hand-painted ceramics, woven table linens, and retro accessories like cloches and Lazy Susans.
