

sufficiency. When we believe in Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam (the world is one family), we must ensure that our family, or country, too is doing well.

The other pillar of reforms over the next two decades should be good institutions. They can help bring about seamless delivery of welfare measures, infrastructure, and government services, which will enhance ease of living through double-digit economic growth.

For ease of doing business, our institutions should not arbitrate and litigate on all issues. Why should the state become a litigant on various matters and not contest and accept the verdict of High Court. They must not reach the Supreme Court unless it's a constitutional matter. Similarly, it should not be the role of the state to run after citizens and litigate against them. Strong institutions can help achieve this. Faceless and paperless government and governance is the objective when we speak about minimum government and maximum governance.

By 2047, we need to think of a prosperous or Viksit Bharat—a perfect country with ease of living and where businesses are not harassed by the state for compliance. In an ideal situation, there should be distance between the state and its citizens the two do not need to interact daily.

For instance, building on the Co-WIN model, there can be a single portal for job seekers and employers, and they can access each other without any interference from the state. Such a model can be used for all development schemes.

When we talk of Viksit Bharat, we also have to focus on Building Rural India—our BRI—which is a crucial part of the country, and its development is essential for the development of the entire country. The focus here too has to be on simplicity, but along with providing all facilities to citizens in rural India as well. Providing housing for all, education, healthcare and all other basic services and facilities is much needed, and work is already underway.

The journey of Viksit Bharat 1991, and being in fast gear in the last decade, must adopt a digital mindset to harness power of technology to deliver development. The success of UPI showed that people needed banking and not banks. CoWIN facilitated that people needed vaccine, and not details about health infrastructure. People want to pay road tax, and fast tag facilitated this. Viksit Bharat is now the aspiration of Bharat and aspirational youth of today. BT
