A NEW STRATEGY

While there are many reasons for the performance of PSUs, one big factor is a more rational capital allocation strategy. "Today, these organisations have created infrastructure leading to scale. With the government in a more meaningful role, managements can have sharper focus," says Deven R Choksey, Chairman and MD of wealth management and investment advisory firm DR-Choksey Finserv. He gives the central government credit for encouraging PSUs to go for more capex and being tough with underperformers.

Power Finance Corporation has significantly realigned its business model, says Chairperson and Managing Director Parminder Chopra. "Reshaping the approach was not only relevant but also increasingly impactful in India's evolving infrastructure landscape," she says. PFC, from a pure-play conventional power sector lender, is now "a broader renewable and infrastructure financier." Its portfolio includes waste-to-energy, renewable power equipment manufacturing, e-mobility, healthcare, sea water desalination, roads, ports and irrigation. This aligns the company with India's rapidly evolving infrastructure needs and reduces risk.

That's not all. PFC has deepened its focus on renewables to support the energy transition, says Chopra. "We finance solar, wind and other green energy projects. This forward-looking shift not only supports sustainability goals but also opens high-growth lending opportunities," she says.

With size comes advantages. Choksey says SBI and Coal India have over the years grown to become "significant global players." While there are many reasons for
