

crore targeted this year. Remarkably, the group remains debt-free.

That conviction also led to an unconventional business model. While most developers treated land acquisition and development as a single business, Mehta saw them as two distinct disciplines requiring very different capabilities. Rather than spending years assembling land parcels and navigating approvals, Tribeca would partner with landowners who brought development-ready sites. Tribeca, in turn, would focus on what it believed would create long-term value: product design, execution, delivery and customer experience.

The asset-light model allowed the company to remain capital-efficient while concentrating its resources on building better projects. It also enabled Tribeca to pursue the best opportunities across markets without being constrained by the size of its land bank.

The strategy found its most visible expression through Tribeca's partnership with The Trump Organization. The relationship helped pioneer branded residences in India and established Tribeca as the exclusive Trump partner in the country. Over time, India became the largest Trump market outside North America, while Tribeca became the largest developer of Trump-branded properties in the world after the Trump Organization itself.

Yet the most important milestone is what came next: Tribeca has increasingly outgrown the brand that launched it.

More than half of Tribeca's portfolio today carries no Trump branding at all. While the Trump relationship remains an important part of the company's story, Tribeca has steadily built a reputation of its own—one rooted in consistently delivering projects that stand apart in their markets.

The proof lies in the portfolio. The Ark in Pune is home to what Tribeca describes as the world's largest rooftop terrace, larger than the rooftop at Marina Bay Sands. Tribeca Highstreet became Pune's largest high-street retail destination. Trump Towers Delhi NCR became one of North India's most successful luxury residential projects. In Mumbai, The Edge recorded approximately ₹1,000 crore in sales within its first month. Trump Residences Gurgaon generated approximately ₹3,250 crore in sales on launch day alone, making it one of the largest luxury residential launches in Indian real estate history.

The timing of Tribeca's rise makes the story even more unusual. Much of its first decade was spent building through one of the most challenging periods Indian real estate has experienced, marked by regulatory upheaval, demonetisation, the NBFC crisis and the pandemic. While many developers and financial institutions struggled, Tribeca emerged stronger. As projects were delivered and its reputation grew, developers and landowners increasingly began seeking out the company as a partner, helping fuel a rapidly expanding development pipeline.

Behind these projects sits a company that increasingly resembles an institution rather than a founder-led development firm. Tribeca today operates with a professional management team led by Group CEO Rajat Khandelwal and is backed by leading institutions including HDFC Capital, ICICI Bank, Tata Capital, Piramal Capital and Aditya Birla Capital. Over the years, the company has built deep capabilities across design, development, execution and delivery, enabling it to scale while maintaining a consistent product philosophy.

Despite that scale, Mehta remains closely involved in the area that first drew him to the business. He continues to personally review design decisions across projects and is known within the company for a philosophy that has become one of its guiding principles: "Quality is not expensive. It is priceless."

For decades, Indian real estate was largely a game of land and capital. As the market matures, however, the winners are increasingly likely to be those that build trusted brands, differentiated products and a reputation for execution. That is the future Tribeca has been betting on since its founding.

The market's response suggests the strategy is working. Across cities and market cycles, customers continue to line up for Tribeca's projects and pay meaningful premiums to own them. Developers and landowners increasingly seek it out as a partner. For a company that started with no land, no money and no track record, that may be the clearest indication yet that its original thesis has been proven.
