

New vistas: Jewellery growth is holding up even at high gold prices. With Taneira, Titan has entered the ethnic wear market not working out. To Chawla, who took charge this January, it comes down to a set of conditions that give you an opportunity to grow. “Not grabbing is the bigger risk,” he says.

With frenetic growth, Titan has become a complex entity. “We started life as a single brand in a single category. Today, we have multiple categories with many brands,” says Chawla. Titan’s approach is flexible and simple. “We have recognised that we may need multiple brands to win in any category. It’s exactly what we have done. In perfumes, too, we have Skinn and Fastrack, and can always add another,” he says. There are no licensed brands here, though in watches, the tack has been different, with a mix of both. Helios addresses the opportunity in multi-brand watch retailing.

Manoj Menon, Head of Research at ICICI Securities, says Titan’s business is going strong. “Jewellery growth remains in the mid-40s, but more importantly, consumer growth has improved and buyer additions have turned positive, which was not the case earlier. This suggests demand is holding up even at high gold prices,” he says. According to him, growth is com-

★ Scale up: Watches and jewellery are good examples

★ Going international: Apart from India, sales in developed markets like West Asia, Europe and the US

★ Synergy: The strategy to enter adjacent businesses has helped, starting with watches to jewellery, before launching Skinn fragrances and Taneira ethnic wear

★ Growth on a large base: In organised jewellery, Titan is the largest, but an 8.5% market share means there is still a lot of headroom to grow. Has forayed into lab-grown diamonds too

★ Price segmentation: Premiumisation has worked well with brands like Zoya, Mia and Titan Nebula
