

WHAT THE BUSINESSES LOOK LIKE

JEWELLERY	WATCHES	EYECARE	INDIAN DRESSWEAR	FRAGRANCES	WOMEN'S BAGS
8.5% market share	27% analog market share in India	Second in organised optical segment	100+ clusters	3,400+ multi brand outlets	17 exclusive Irth brand outlets
20%+ digitally influenced sales	10,000+ touch points	800+ exclusive brand outlets	75+ exclusive Taneira brand outlets	14 Skinn kiosks

| 19

SOURCE COMPANY EARNINGS PRESENTATION FOR FY26

nity exists, we can leverage our existing strengths,” says Chawla, pausing briefly before gathering his thoughts on the other forays. “Perfumes are not a retail-led play but more distribution-led. Eyewear is a retail play and, in fact, more retail service since it’s about optometry.”

Bags, too, are distribution-led. “It’s fair to say we have developed a certain approach on the business model both from the point of view of retailing and serving the consumer,” says Chawla.

With Taneira, Titan has entered the ethnic wear market, with sarees accounting for a large chunk of that. “Both jewellery and sarees play on India’s pride and its deep cultural heritage. People keep saying sarees is a dying category, but it’s been alive for 5,000 years,” he says.

Naveen Trivedi, Senior VP, Research Analyst (Consumer & FMCG), Institutional Equities, Motilal Oswal Financial Services, says Titan is uniquely positioned due to brand recall. “This is particularly true when most of its product categories are largely driven by regional, local and unorganised brands,” he says. Jewellery, eyecare and watches, he says, have been dominated by unorganised players. “Titan has built high brand recall around trust, consistency and improvisation. Plus, these categories have enough legs to keep the momentum over the next three-five years.”

Chawla gives a few interesting insights that helped carve out key components of the long-term strategy. “When we initially did sunglasses, we realised the category was about eyewear and sunglasses is a part of it,” he says. A programme called Future Shock saw the company moving from a brand extension-led approach to one that was category-led, since the focus was now about building the category.

“When we applied the category-led play, we took a look at our strengths. It was clear we did well when we served white spaces. That meant either the mar-