and a high degree of discretion, these vehicles are particularly well-suited for chauffeur-driven use, enabling customers to utilise travel time more productively,” says Sabari Manohar, Executive Vice President, Sales-Service-Used Car Business, Toyota Kirloskar Motor.

As extended commute times become a part of daily life for many business leaders, the focus is shifting towards the overall in-cabin experience. This shift reflects a broader evolution in mobility preferences where the vehicle is an extension of one’s workspace, says Manohar. “We are seeing strong demand for the Vellfire from start-up founders, entrepreneurs from fintech, logistics and D2C sectors, as well as politicians, who are placing greater emphasis on practicality,” he explains.

While the Toyota Vellfire, priced from roughly ₹1.3 crore (ex-showroom), continues to be the top-selling luxury MPV, its ultra-luxury cousin, the Lexus LM 350h is the most expensive one with prices starting at ₹2.2 crore.

Even though the Japanese are ruling the roost in luxury MPVs, German carmaker Mercedes-Benz was the first one to bring a luxury MPV to India with the launch of Mercedes-Benz V-Class in 2019, which was discontinued in 2022 due to weak sales. However, Mercedes-Benz has re-entered the fast-growing MPV segment with the locally assembled V-Class in 2026.

“We are seeing a structural shift where affluent customers are seeking vehicles that go beyond traditional luxury sedans and SUVs, prioritising privacy, space and a more personalised travel experience,” says Santosh Iyer, MD & CEO, Mercedes-Benz India.

Iyer says the V-Class has seen strong response from celebrities, entrepreneurs and corporate leaders. These customers, he says, already own multiple luxury vehicles and are looking for a differentiated mobility solution that helps them do business on the move.
