How worried are you looking at the recent market fall?

In the market, there are two types of people—buyers and sellers. Buyers prefer a downturn, while sellers want prices to rise. As a buyer, I see this as an opportunity. Prices are reasonable, valuations look attractive, and for someone like me, who earns a salary and invests regularly, these are favourable times.

Are we nearing the bottom or are we in for long-term pain?

Concerns about market froth and high valuations were already being discussed over the past year. A correction was always on the cards. While the past five months have been challenging, such corrections follow a long one-way market rally. The shift began late last year when multiple factors converged—an urban slowdown, a weakening rupee, slowing GDP growth, and FIIs (foreign institutional investors) pulling out. When an overbought market faces such pressures, a correction is inevitable.

Even today, despite broader participation, Indian markets remain relatively illiquid, making them vulnerable to cascading selloffs. However, from an investor’s perspective, the margin of safety is now
