from there to 150 MTPA. Now, we are set to add the next 50 MTPA in just three years. To put that in perspective, UltraTech's cement capacity is 180% of the United States' cement output and 110% of Europe's production.

Sustainability is at the heart of our long-term vision. We are making bold investments in green energy, circular economy initiatives, and large-scale recycling. A prime example is Novelis' $4.1 billion aluminium rolling and recycling mill in the US, the largest greenfield investment in the US by any Indian business group. This is a decisive bet on the growing global demand for sustainable packaging, a shift that is irreversible.

Reimagining legacy business models has also been key. Even in our B2B businesses, we have worked to get closer to the end consumer. Take our fibre business—we challenged conventional value chain structures by creating Liva, an ingredient brand that now enjoys a strong consumer pull.

A global mindset fuels our resilience. We have diversified revenue streams and mitigated geographical risks by thinking beyond operational efficiencies. Strategic adjacencies, such as leveraging our extensive white cement dealer network to power our entry into the paints segment, have been a game-changer.

Therefore, by combining scale with sustainability, deepening customer engagement, and leveraging adjacencies, we have built businesses primed for future growth.

Transitioning into B2C sectors like fashion, retail, and financial services requires a different strategic approach compared to traditional industries. What are the key shifts in mindset necessary for success? Can you share a few examples that illustrate this transformation?

We have been in the B2C space for over three
