THERE is a sense of newness at Zomato. The corporate entity has a new name, Eternal, and a new structure. In FY24, it turned profitable and, since then, has been able to sustain that. This helped the company—which leads in the food delivery and quick commerce segments—prove the strength of its business model and get more investor interest.

This is a sea change from the time it announced the acquisition of Blinkit, a quick commerce player, in June 2022 for $569 million (then ₹4,447 crore). The stock market gave a thumbs down to the deal. The Zomato stock fell by a third from its listing price. Despite that, the management bet on the compelling growth opportunity and went ahead with the purchase. Today, Blinkit is generating massive excitement as Zomato re-writes the rulebook on making new-age companies profitable.

WHAT HE DID RIGHT

- 01 Made the shift from a food delivery company to a set of well-diversified businesses
- 02 Acquired Blinkit, a q-commerce player, for $569 million, despite market misgivings
- 03 Success in food delivery allows Zomato a better understanding of consumer behaviour and sharpens the offering
- 04 Forayed into live entertainment by launching District; also, bought Paytm's entertainment and ticketing business
