der booking, for example, and we want to be the one with the newest technology,” he says.

His son, Prashant Bangur, the company’s vice chairman, chips in by outlining how customer interface is increasingly more about technology. “India is a developing market and offers a lot of choice. We must make that process easy, and technology plays a big role in doing that,” he says. The company is using artificial intelligence (AI) for demand forecasting, improving the supply chain, and determining more cost-efficient structures, among other things.

To that extent, it is not a surprise when Akhoury draws out his mobile and shows you a picture of his latest offering—it is a premium product called Marble, which was launched this February in Bihar, Jharkhand, and West Bengal. This is part of a larger strategy to go premium with cement, not an easy proposition in the commodity space.

Premiumisation in cement is especially hard because it’s a price-sensitive, low-differentiation, and influencer-driven market where branding and product “experience” have limited impact. Only in niche segments—like white cement, decorative cement, or large commercial projects—does premiumisation have a substantial play.

For Akhoury, the shift to premiumisation is in line with the changing Indian demographic. “Affluence has brought a marked preference for high-performance products and building materials,” he says.

Last January, the company launched a new brand identity, with “Bangur” as the master brand. With actor Sunny Deol as the ambassador, it unveiled Bangur Magna, a premium offering. “From three brands earlier (Shree, Bangur, and Rockstrong), a master brand allows us to combine three separate sales organisations and manage costs more effectively,” says Akhoury.

Magna, and now Marble, are the key pillars of Shree’s premiumisation journey. “Now, we are doing some
