

From what I can see, India is taking gigantic steps in a market filled with both opportunities and challenges. One can argue that some things move a little slower [here] than in other places, but one must also understand that getting 1.4 billion people to move in a particular direction is a major challenge (smiles). People speak of diversity in Europe, but this is very different. Given the complexity of the market, we must be patient and not overdo things. A lot of time goes into understanding the mentality of consumers to give ourselves a strong position. We have been here for a longer time than most others and our success is there [for all] to see... I am quite satisfied about being in India.

Q: How critical is it to have an India-specific strategy?

A: When I put my mind to that, I realise that 90% of the things apply to most markets around the globe. For sure, we reach out to the ultra-high net-worth individuals and that is a growing market. Indians might buy in other countries but not necessarily in India. It is a point we must take into consideration and perhaps the Indian footprint is much bigger than we know.

Other than that, it is important for us to get into the community. The thing is, they (the community) have to buy into the brand. There are a lot of activities that money can't buy... [say,] it could be a motorsport event. And we meet a lot of Indians who ask us what Lamborghini is doing next. Proximity to our customers is important and that helps us understand what they want, what they like, and what we can improve. This community is one we must cherish. Plus, we have our partners, with whom we work very closely. The feedback comes from them and that makes a huge difference. It all comes down to customer satisfaction or customer delight.

Q: The automobile industry is about how the brands are positioned. What makes the process of owning your car unique?

A: We work a lot on awareness. You can't leave anyone behind... For the people who buy our cars, they should understand there is no envy... We want to be a part of a very positive evolution and must continuously move in that direction. At the end of it, we are not selling mobility. We are selling dreams.

It's about design, performance, and technical innovation. The way we go about it should be an example not only for those who are developing cars, but also for
