

42 | those in any kind of business. After all, we go the extra mile to do something, which is often difficult to get out of the latest technology. We work the brand around a few things, and these are some of the key elements. We cannot go wrong with any of them. One must understand that it is about limited volumes and high investment. Every model has to be a winner—else it will be difficult.

Q: You are selling dreams to the buyer...

A: You have to surpass what the buyer has in mind when he buys the car. The wow effect has to be multiplied each time and, therefore, it's not about who owns the car. It's about what you create as a community and that's how the word spreads and helps in getting new customers.

Q: What are the interesting trends you see in the global luxury car market?

A: Apart from the mega trends, there is electrification, AI, and the piece on digitisation. These are not commoditised but will be taken for granted (or already are). Now, it will be about owning something that your neighbour does not [have] or having something different from the others. There are two ways of doing it. One is with the line-up of models in terms of colours or style. Then, there are the one-offs, where we create the 'once in a while cars'. These are limited and a part of the history of Lamborghini since they are built maybe once, 10 times or perhaps 100-150 times. This is a trend that is increasingly becoming a part of the luxury business.

Q: What else will determine the form and shape of the luxury car market over the next four to five years?

A: I always try to classify this [business] into two [parts]. One is the classic luxury business. It is about 'nice to have' [cars] but they don't give rise to emotions. Then, we have the sporty part of the business—[cars] that are attractive and make people dream. It is important to keep creating emotion around the brand.

Q: Speaking of segmentation, when do you decide the market is ready for a certain brand?

A: Usually, when we enter as a brand, the aim is to give you the full line-up. We have a portfolio consisting of SUV, XXL, LM, and GT cars and the 2+2 Gran Tourer. Take the example of markets like Vietnam, Norway and Argentina, where we looked at factors such as where the economy is placed. A lot of other elements are considered with the objective of making it a sustainable business. But once we enter, it has to be with the full line-up.

Q: What do you like about hybrids and why is it important?

A: It's about combining reduced emissions and delivering a better performance. We don't want to have heavy cars and power to weight ratio. Ultimately, it has to be a winner for the consumer. BT
