Taking the same idea forward is The Beaumont Mayfair in London, where guests can stay in a cocoon. Called simply the ROOM (£1,840 per night), it is a 745-sq. ft. suite inside a three-storey stainless steel abstract sculpture of a crouching man at the hotel entrance. The bedroom of this suite lacks a TV, phone or even wall art—it's completely bare. According to the hotel, the ROOM encourages its occupants to enter a different state of consciousness, to enjoy a quiet, meditative pause, a prelude to a good night's sleep and the chance to withdraw from the busy world outside.

While luxury hotels have been providing pillow menus for nearly a decade now, some hotels are being more cognizant of people's beliefs. The Hilton London Bankside, for instance, provides a vegan pillow menu to replace feather down pillows. So, you have pillows made of buckwheat hull, millet husks, etc.

The Soneva Soul Sleep Programme in the Maldives offers either seven ($4,650) or 14 days ($11,295) accommodation (meals not included). Their 360-degree programme encompasses nervous system rebalancing via mindfulness and meditation practices, daily movement through yoga and exercise classes and personalised sleep rituals such as herbal baths. Alongside, guests are encouraged to wake up in the morning to reset their circadian rhythm and walk barefoot to balance their body's electromagnetic field.

While a holistic approach seems ideal, some hotels are banking on technology. The Kimpton Fitzroy in London, for instance, has a Room To Dream package, which gives guests a chance to experience lucid dreaming with the help of AI, via a VR headset and a specific herbal tea. In the morning, guests can send the description of their dream to an AI artist, who creates a visual interpretation of it. It can be added to any existing booking for £50.

The Mandarin Oriental has a sleep concierge at its Hyde Park property in London. She is a hypnotherapist. Starting at £500, guests can meet her in the spa for a sleep consultation and session tailored to their sleep issues. They can also ask for a private session, to help them drift to sleep. The Mandarin Oriental is planning sleep concierge pop-ups at its other hotels in Europe.

With weary and sleep deprived travellers, hotels are going all out to ensure you get those extra forty winks. BT
