Kenneth Andrade, Founder and CIO of Old Bridge Mutual Fund, believes at a 5-6% growth rate, India will remain one of the top growing countries. Speaking to Business Today, he dwells on India’s position in a post-tariff world. He also speaks about gold as a hedge against uncertainties. Edited excerpts:

This is a time of extreme volatility and now it seems that the worst of the tariff-related news may have already been priced in by markets. President Trump also seems to be softening vis-à-vis China. Is that the right way to read the current situation?

Well, all of this is still evolving, so we do not know how it would go. It is really a new environment that we are studying.

So, over the course of the next couple of quarters or years, the environment will still be reasonably fluid, and we probably need to take it one quarter or one year at a time.

Both the Indian markets and the economy are slightly better placed than most of the global peers.

We seem to be pretty much placed well economically.

I think this 5-6% growth that we are looking at in terms of real GDP growth, if we achieve that, which I think we will, we will still be among the fastest growing economies globally. Two, there were concerns that the market expect this consolidation to last a little while.

What is likely to happen to foreign institutional investor (FII) inflows—will they find their way back to India?

At 6%, or even a 5% growth, we will be amongst the

You said the macro environment will remain fluid and at times like this discussing valuations and stock prices may not be really material. How reasonable are Indian equities looking?

has been unidirectional and there a lot of inconsistencies that had surfaced, both with the primary market and with small caps.

I think that has tempered quite a bit. I think the best situation for us, as investors, is to top growing countries. That should attract its own set of capital. India has got its own set of fans, and global investors have been looking at Indian markets reasonably hard. They’ve just been put off by valuations. Now I think that will change a bit. Global
