had been around for almost 100 years and had a modest 7% EBITDA (earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortisation) margin. “In the last three-four years, we have doubled revenues. Margins are 11%,” he says. Nirmal Bang’s report on Berger outlines the increased focus on construction chemicals. “While the average selling price in the segment is low, the margins are higher,” it says.

The foray was the outcome of long deliberations starting 2016 on the company’s next big move. This was a couple of years after the launch of Express Painting, which gave the company a premium tag and an entry into services. “Someone spoke of damp patches as an opportunity. It seemed strange since damp-proofing was the answer,” recalls Roy. A closer look at the category threw up potential in adjacent areas. Pidilite’s Dr Fixit was already there but the waterproofing and chemicals segment seemed large.

Jaiswal says it is necessary for paint companies to step outside their traditional areas. “The modern customer is looking for a solution. The focus has shifted to offering a comprehensive range of products
